As rule in England Whigs vote with the Whigs IVERPOOL COARSE SALT AND ROCK SALT and Tories with the Tories; and so strong this habit that Radicals have been repro with a base desertion of their natural leaders for voting with the Conservatives on special points. In Germany there are half a dozen parties in the Parliament, and they combine and separate and recombine according to the subject under discussion. But the Government cares nothing except to get a majority for each individual measure, for it rests on no one party, and owns no special allegiance. A Parliamentary majority is necessary to its legislation, but not to its existence as a Government. No division in the lobbies called it into being, and no adverse division snuffs it out of existence. In the British colonies the observas of current events will notice that Parliamentary government and party government are beginning to show an increasing divergence, and to mean different things, although they are still spoken of as if they meant the same thing. But party government here is largely wanting in a natural basis, and in spits of the exhortations and lamentations of those who wish exactly to reproduce the old spite of the exhortations and lamentations of those who wish exactly to reproduce the old English style, members of colonial Parliaments do, to a large extent, treat each measure on its own merits, and content themselves with giving a general support to the Administration whose personnel and tone they prefer. The consequence of this has been that on many occasions there has been shown an inclination to the accent a defeat on any new contents. clination hot to accept a defeat on any par-ticular measure as a Ministerial defeat, so long as there was a Parliamentary majority favourable to the continuance of the Ministry,

The reader of the article on which we have been commenting will not fail to notice that the distinctions between the English and German systems arise from the fact that they have grown from two different centres. In Germany the dominant idea has been that of a strong Government, and effective administration, and without a strong military power to rest upon the system would collapse. may acquire more of executive vigour and administrative efficiency.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1878.

It is always a good thing to be subjected to intelligent criticism; and in national affairs the criticism of not unfriendly foreigners is, as a rule, not unsuggestive. For a foreigner studies national questions not only from a different point of view from our own, but with and preju favour of what he has been accustomed to: In approval because it is necessary to the Fraser's Magazine of May last, is an article on nation's existence. In England the Constitu-English and German party government, written by a German. It is a comparison of the two liberty, and the people have thought less of systems, studied from a Berlin point of view, wise government than of self-government with some appreciation of English merits, but at the same time with a comfortable contact. viction that the German system is the best. The writer quotes Macaulay's well-known description of the inherent distinction. The German system may admit more of the that always will exist in society between the element of liberty, and the English system Radicals and the Conservatives—between those who want to go too fast and those who want to go too low. He doubts the truth of this distinction, and endeavours to trace the existence of English parties rather to historical causes and associations than to essentiate the existence of the Court of Commerce at the existence of the House of the House of the House of the existence of the House of the House of the existence of the House of the House of the existence of the House of the House of the existence of the House of the House of the House of the existence of the House of the tial facts in human nature. To a German, with his fondness for technical education and professional training, the idea of appointing a man who has been accustomed to one thing to do another is abhorent, and the art of administration is not improperly conceived as one that requires some special talents and some special training. "3, Livarpool-terrace, Crewe, June 10, 1876.

"Mr. Booth.—Deer Str.—I have for a long time suffered with a bad leg—the inflammation extending from the three to the toes—which was rapidly breaking up my constitution. As a least resort I obtained from you a small bottle of 'Clarke's Blood Mixture,' and experienced so much relief from it that I persevered, and seven (7) small bottles cured me. I have resommended it to several of my friends, who are now improving rapidly under its use.—Your truly,
